Creag Isle is a contemporary range of Island Malts sourced by our Malt Master from various Scottish Islands which are famed for their distinct flavours and aromas. Whether it be Single Malt or Blended Malt, each bottle within the range has its own individual character which is complemented by the bold packaging design. This expression is traditionally aged in oak casks for a minimum of 12 years prior to bottling. This whisky is characteristic of these island malts with full-bodied aroma and powerful yet complex depth of flavour. Bottler's evaluation:

Nose: Robust peat with a hint of coal tar. Addition of a little water breaks the dominance of the peat and releases subtle fruit and floral characteristics.

Palate: Big and bold with characteristically smoky notes. Over time the strong peat character gives way to a more subtle oak derived sweetness.

Finish: Very long lasting smoke.

The Glengoyne Distillery was established in Dumgoyne, just north of Glasgow in Scotland, in 1833. Glengoyne single malt whiskey is a unique hybrid because the distillery is located on the borderline, dividing the highlands and the lowlands. It is distilled in the highlands and then transferred into oak casks where it matures, just across the road, in the lowlands. Initially, in 1833, the distillery was known as the Burnfoot distillery. When in 1876 the Lang Bros purchased the distillery, the name was mistakenly recorded as Glen Guin, which means the Glen of the Wild Geese. In 1894 the document was changed to read Glengoyne.

Nose: It's a similar nose to the 10 and 18 but with more wood, it's really oaky. It's also not as fresh and there is more sherry. Some honey, bananas, spice and a little earthiness.

Palate: Lot's of oak again and dry sherry is the dominant flavour up front. A little sweetness then comes into play with apple, malt and some spiciness. I then get some salted caramel coming into the mix. It is rounded and mature.

Finish: Sherry, oak and leather fade to an incredibly dry sherry finish which is a little too much for my taste.
