Benromach Peat Smoke Speyside Single Malt NAS. 46% ABV

Island (and Islay) whisky is made from malted barley smoked over fires of peat dug from ocean-adjacent peat bogs, often full of seaweed or beach grasses and continuously sprayed by seawater-laden winds. The effect of that peat is complex, funky, salty, medicinal, and downright bracing. Mainland peat is composed of Highland grasses and shrubs. When barley is smoked with this peat, it becomes infused with the smells of a woodland campfire – slightly piney. The Peat Smoke release is made from barley smoked to 67 ppm (that's pretty high: Ardbeg is 55 ppm and Bruichladdich Octomore, the highest, is in the 160s) and is aged in first-fill ex-Bourbon casks (from Heaven Hill and/or Jim Beam) for between 9 and 10 years, although the bottle carries no age statement. The whisky is bottled at 46% ABV with no added color.

Nose: Woodsmoke (smoldering campfire), vanilla, and light oak. Somewhat anemic, and very dry.

Palate: Black pepper and a lot more smoldering campfire.

Finish: A fading, slightly bitter, reprise of the vanilla-and-smoke motif.

With Water: A few drops of water add some floral notes – like white tea – which are quickly voided by the smokiness.

The Benromach distillery has a rocky history of lengthy closures and juggling ownership since its construction in 1898, but is now in the steady hands of independent bottlers Gordon & MacPhail. The new owners refurbished the distillery and began producing malt in earnest in 1998, and are now bringing a line of official bottlings to market. The distillery uses water from a spring in the Romach Hills, and proudly claims to use only first-fill barrels for aging whisky.
